

To whom it may concern,

I have had a TBI since April 25, 1997. I was in a car accident and I died 3 times. The EMTs brought me back to life. After I left the Hospital, I went to a facility home where I learned how to do everything all over again (walk, talk, eat, and even how to bath myself. That is only a few.) If it wasn't for these homes or the the apartment programs that I could get into I probably be homeless. I have a life where I live. I go on trips, go to yoga classes, do social group class and they also have coffee group. Where they play games and we talk about how are day or week has been. I also have feel in love with the female of my dreams. If this law passes we might be split up and then I don't really know what I will do with my life.

Now the nurcing homes that may come into effect. Are they going to be able to treat every human being that have something wrong with them. They all are not going to have the same problems. TBIs are all different.

Sincerely,
Leonard Reid Jr.
